Louella Thomas, author “An American Nightmare”

Women are infrequently the focus of child abuse – physical abuse, much less sexual abuse; yet we know that women have a presence as predators, a distinct profile in the generation of sexual abuse onset and ongoing victimization of the subjects. The female actor in this case – pimp, trafficker, trading on the young childrens' loyalties to her as their mother, present a particularly compelling profile of a female psychopath.

Our heroic speaker, author of the family horror story “An American Nightmare”, Louella Thomas, covers a landscape of unremitting, unresolved sexual abuse of three very young children, covering discovery, attempts at reporting, court intervention, total failure of protection and seemingly irretrievable loss of the children as the mother and paramour /predator escape (with the blessings of the court) to parts unknown.

Authorities knew exactly what crimes were being committed – sexual brutality/sexual trafficking of young children/collusion of authorities in cover up of multiple crimes/engagement in sexual battery of children. First degree actors were those immediately involved from the inception of the crime, secondary actors were those whom had knowledge of acts being committed – who did nothing!

Our focus today is to look at this horror as it unfolded in the presence of multiple levels of institutional FAILURE :

Police

DCF

Family Court

Impotence of Legal Intervention

We do not intend to shy away from those issues too often not mentioned – Criminal Engagement of primary first responders to a crime scene or to the source of initial intervention – police – personal bias, driven by discretion and fundamental, pervasive incompetence related to inadequate training, supervision, expertise. All of the above conspire to fail to provide fundamental uncontaminated evidence, time line, witness evidence, scientific evidence, clear legal procedure to create an objective framework for moving forward to serve and protect vulnerable populations.
